Jia Jia is a Hong Kong-born Chinese woman who must decide what to do with her life and what to do with her heart after finding out she is pregnant. Once again, her parents arrange for her to marry someone and be saved from the trouble of giving birth to a child with a non-Asian. When she returns to Hong Kong, she has an abortion. History Pre-production After initially starting her writing career in New York City, Mila was hired to pen the film titled "Whose Baby Is It?" The movie's producer,

Markham von Gernet, sent her a free copy of the script and asked her to rewrite it. With the rewrite complete and two additional writers on board, she was then sent to L.A. to audition for the film's lead actress role. After doing her best to sell herself to director Jay Sandrich, she was hired. As the film was being finished, Mila was sent to Taiwan to film the pre-title scenes with her co-star, Jia Jia. The film was shot in Taiwan's capital, Taipei, and the surrounding countryside. After the filming was complete, Mila went back to New York City to finish writing the story of "What's Up, Dia?" Filming Production on

"What's Up, Dia?" began in April 2003. To complete the film, Mila, who had just moved to New York City from Los Angeles, had to stop working on "Whose Baby Is It?" and take on the double-duty of simultaneously writing both stories. The filming took about 9 months. For "What's Up, Dia?", Mila and the director met with various doctors in New York City. There, the filmmakers filmed the medical scenes with a series of actors. After their friends and co-workers knew what they were doing, Mila and the director filmed them in the background of the scenes. After "What's Up, Dia?" was completed, Mila went back to Los Angeles to begin working on her next film, "Whose Baby Is It?".
